Over the past two years, the Covid-19 pandemic exposed the fragile nature of our world, and it changed the way we do business. World economy hit. Global supply chains disconnected. Business confidence shaken. Unemployment surged. Public services disrupted. Government leaders faced difficult decisions to prioritise resources and budgets to maintain normalcy. They are key to restoring public confidence and business sustainability.

The Covid-19 pandemic has created an unprecedented shock to global business, but the lesson learnt from this bout has also presented internal audit with the opportunity to reposition for the future. Internal audit functions need to leverage this disruption and move to a more resilient, innovative and futuristic operating model where they can play the vital role of supporting their organisations to emerge stronger in a post Covid-19 future.

The public sector is one of Singapore's largest employers, and has been impacted and disrupted by the recent pandemic. What is required to keep the internal audit function resilient and forward-looking in the face of challenges, especially when resources are limited?

What type of leadership is needed to support business stakeholders in navigating a world that requires alignment between company purpose, social good, and economic returns?
